PREFACE

After many months of research, and thanks to the generosity of Bücker owners all over the world, the most recent list of surviving CASA-Bücker Jungmann has been updated. These are the airframes that have been positively identified by the data plate in the rear portion of the fuselage.

Trying to piece together this puzzle has been challenging. When they were manufactured, each Bücker was assigned an individual 'E.3B' number by the Spanish Air Force. They also assigned a particular fuselage to go with that plane, having a brass identification plate located on a steel fuselage tube near the tail.

Over time, the Bücker became worn as young Spanish pilots learned how to fly them. When the planes reached a certain number of flight hours, they were sent to repair depots for overhaul. Sometimes, accidents happened. Wings, landing gear, and even replacement fuselages were substituted for worn out or damaged components. I do not think the Spanish Air Force mechanics cared if the original identities matched. They had Bücker to keep in the air and replacing parts was part of the job.

From Spanish Air Force records, we know the original 'E.3B' number assigned to each plane as well as the original fuselage Serial Numbers. We have found that some Bückers retained both original identities. Others, have fuselages swapped from other planes during overhaul or repair.

All this makes a researcher's life very interesting.

Your help is greatly needed. There are still many Bückers needing to be identified. If you have a moment, please let us know your 'E.3B' number and your fuselage Serial Number. If you can take a picture of the brass plate near the tail, that would be even better. We include again in this report the "Guide", which will help you to find such a plate.

Respectfully,

The CASA Jungmann Research Team

HOW TO IDENTIFY A CASA/BÜCKER JUNGMANN

To rightly identify the Jungmann, you must find the little brass plate located on a tube on the left rear side of the fuselage. With the following instructions you will be able to find the plate:

1.- Open the V-shaped zip, hole or flap on the rear left side of the fuselage:

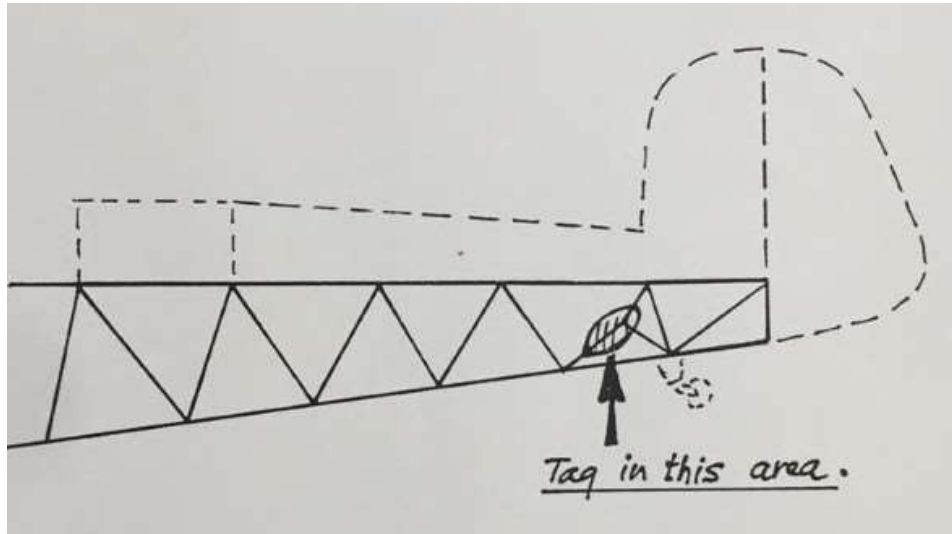

2.- Inside you will see the tube, which is almost parallel to the right side of the zip. On this tube you will find one or two plates. The plate is small and may be painted over, so look thoroughly:

The plate(s) show(s) the msn of the plane. By sending us a photo of the plate(s), we will be able to find the true identity and history of the plane (the most part of the CASA Jungmann are bad registered and have a wrong identification).

IMPORTANT: The plate is small and may be covered by paint, rust, grease or dust, so look thoroughly. Running your hand along the tube is also a good solution to determine where they might be located. This drawing may help you to narrow the search area.

NOTE:

There is often also another plate, located on the instrumental panel close to the magnetos keys in the rear cockpit. When the plane left the factory, this plate showed the msn (Nº de Fca.) and the manufacturing month and year). However, panels were often swapped between the planes, and this plate must not be taken as proof of the identity. If your plane has a 'Nº de Fca.' plate, please also send us a photo of it. It gives us information of when the printed msn was manufactured. A photo showing the whole plane is also very welcome.

The red arrow indicates the location of the small manufacturing plate shown above.

After having received your photo(s), we will come back to you with all information we have found about the history of your Jungmann.

Many thanks for helping us in our research.
